Madonna takes the director's cut

Abbey dares to bare because she has the figure for it

Fabby Abbey

My This Morning co-star Abbey Clancy rocked the red carpet at the recent GQ Awards in a barely there black lace dress. Some people have claimed it was too skimpy, but at Abbey's age, and with her fabulous body, why not flaunt what you've got? Back in the day, Madonna famously shocked us with some of her raunchier outfits, yet at the premiere of her new film about Wallis Simpson she looked both classy and demure in a full-length silk gown. Just goes to show that we all grow into our style eventually.

I love hearing what real people think

Lets all do The Hub!

There's a back to school feeling at This Morning after the summer. Holly's on top form, successfully juggling being a mum and a gorgeous TV presenter (I hate her, only joking!). The Hub has been buzzing with people giving their views. I'd rather be talking to real people on-line than interviewing some star in person. Unless of course it's George Clooney...

The fear factor

It seems to me the balance of X Factor has tilted too far towards the 'wacky' auditionees, most of whom can't sing or take criticism without a sit-down protest. They do make me giggle, but I worry that some of these people are quite vulnerable and think that finding themselves ridiculed by the nation will one day prove too much for someone. None of us will be laughing then. Bring on the talent I say and let the proper competition begin.

Do you thing and then take what's coming to you!

Rough justice?

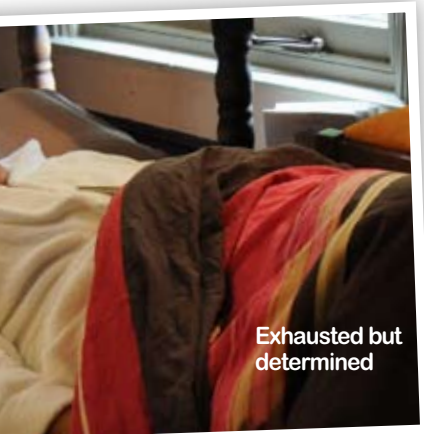

There's talk about real-life trials being televised in the UK. While I am unashamedly a reality TV addict I'm not sure how I feel about this. The thought of watching some nasty thug get a derisory sentence would probably see me hurling the remote control at the TV screen.

Lost in Translation

I'm not sure Top Gear's Jeremy Clarkson would have been my top choice to voice the new TomTom satnav. After all, he does love his handbrake turns. But I've lost faith in type of technology anyway. You see, one evening I offered to drive my mum-in-law Irene home to Blackpool. It's an hour from my house and despite knowing the route, on this occasion, I decided to follow my trusty Satnav. Two and half hours later – with Irene's frozen food defrosting in the boot – we were still trapped in Warrington's one-way system. When I pulled over to tell Ray, he couldn't believe where we were!

e's a REAL man!

Exhausted but determined

Did you see Little Britain's David Walliams embarking on his latest venture for Sport Relief – a 140-mile charity swim down the length of the Thames? God love him for doing this, especially as the water has bugs and even sewage! No wonder David got struck down with food poisoning, but like the fully paid-up luvvie he is, he adopted a 'show must go on' attitude. David might wear a dress on screen in Little Britain and enjoy camping it up on the red carpet but I bet his model wife Lara Stone is so proud of him. That's what I call a real man.
